SARDINE SHORTAGE FOR NAVAL FORCES PROLONGS FISHING

lar American sardine canning season on the Maine coast closes December 1, as a rule, but there are indications that an extension of a few months will be granted by the Government, ewing to the small pack of the season. The Government has sent out a call for many thousands of cases of Maine sardines for the navy, and there will be a shortage if the senson is not ex-

For many weeks the large herring, sultable for canning, have been scarce about Passamaquoddy bay and Bay of Fundy, and prices ran high on the opening of the sesson. At times $50 a hogshead was paid for the fish, even $80, and the price up to early in September was $20.

There are many schools of "britt," or small herring, in all parts of Passumanual and a supplementation of the sesson of the s or small herring, in all parts of Passimaquoddy bay, and every day these can be seen swimming about the Eastport docks, but they are not suitable for canning, and it will be several weeks before they grow to the proper size to be taken, although a few canners are gathering up all in sight and packing these small fish "crosswise" in the tin cans, similar to Norwegian-packed sardines, that are not being put up this season in quantities.

The Maine coast pack of sardines in recent years has run to about 2,300,000 cases and even larger, and this season recent years has run to about 2,000,000 cases and even larger, and this reason it is far below that figure, so that there will be a scarcity of American mordines on the market when they are most needed as an economical food.

There are more than fifty sardine factories on the Maine coast, but the largest are located in Eastport, where a dozen plants are running steadily. A few put up over 3,000 cases of 100 cases each in a day when its is plenticans each in a day when rish is plentiful. It required about 800 hogshead; of herring of ten baskets each to sup-ply all the Eastport sarding factories every working day.
